When I first got to the station in the first room, there were 3 men (young white officer that brought me, young black officer, young black nurse). The black officer pulled up my straps on my dress (they were falling down) and I thanked him. His response was flirty and "No, thank you!" Then he stated to the other men "those straps are struggling." (making references to my large breasts). They all three laughed. The white officer had been very professional with me until that point, but then agreed and laughed with them." It continued and the nurse and black officer continued to laugh and talk about my large breasts. The black officer said "those puppies are struggling in that dress". I told them I was dressed to go to dinner and there was nothing wrong with my dress. They kept laughing and making jokes and references to my large breasts.

I asked for tampons and they turned that into a joke and started laughing. The whole experience was humiliating and degrading and very unprofessional.

The ladies in the holding room also heard the conversation about my breasts and it continued in the middle of the station room where one of the men advised the other men in the room to "check out my large breasts when I came through".
